“Planned Parenthood treated women like cattle.”

- Ramona Treviño, former Planned Parenthood manager, Sherman, TX

While Planned Parenthood pursues profit from pushing abortions, the other “services” it supposedly provides to women suffer as a result.

Former Planned Parenthood center manager Ramona Treviño witnessed this declining standard of care first hand and explained to Live Action how the abortion chain cut in half the amount of time staff spent with new clients, many of whom were minors. Treviño pointed out how this neglect was especially egregious when it came to birth control, as improper instruction could lead to more unintended pregnancies and more abortions:

“Not only are you not discussing the options, but once the option is made...to be able to discuss how those function, how they work, and to educate them on how to actually use those methods, it just seems unethical to not spend that time with your patient.”

Sue Thayer, a Planned Parenthood facility manager in Iowa for 17 years, described what she witnessed as a result of the relentless pursuit of more clients and the ever-increasing role of abortion in the business model:

“Over the years I worked there, the mission statement came down. Up went abortion goals and all the other goals we were required to meet. The nurse practitioner that had been there four days a week was now there two hours a week, but we were still seeing the same amount of clients. It felt wrong.”

Thayer explained how management pushed “harder and harder” for more clients, first requiring affiliates to see “four [clients] an hour,” then “five an hour.” These requirements took a toll on the standard of care: “Women were just herded through.”

“It is definitely not someplace that I would want to see my daughters go. I wouldn’t want them to have care like that,” Thayer added. “I don’t think that’s care; that’s not health care.”
